I feel bad about Microsoft's Windows games, a great idea that for one reason <sup>3</sup> or another it hasn't blossomed yet. I have previously been misled by that here and here, so summarize: released in May 2007 with the Windows version <sup>3</sup> Halo 2, only 29 official titles live since then, and dozens more GFW brand games that have Xbox 360 analogs, but no corresponding games for Windows Live support, therefore: there are no pairings based <sup>4</sup> <sup>4</sup> on GFW, Gamertag achievements and tracking. Since Microsoft has done relatively little to promote the service, it probably hasn't been able to talk about on-demand games, the coughing response in the hand of the company to digital download services like Impulse and Gamersgate. It launches today: no, I'm not making this up, with a grand total of 13 games! All right, there's good news to follow that imposing anticlimax: Microsoft is using the service to give away Tinker, a puzzle that was originally included with Windows Vista. It's also offering 50 percent discounts on Shadowrun, a decent solo shooter on the line who never got the support he deserves, and Viva Pinata, a game about the crAa of cute little animals that look like those sweet-filled things with a stick. content for the platform. While a video snippet with great graphics may work well for a short Tiktok video, that approach may not work as well on Twitter. For that platform, it may be better to write a prominent quote from the video, as it is a heavy text application. To generate the best results, you will need to adapt the content to the platform. 5. Use audio for a podcast. What better way to use audio than embed it into a podcast? It's one of the most popular ways people consume information these days. While your video may not work well as a full podcast episode, you can use clips from the video to include in your podcast series. For example, if you interviewed someone in your live video and your podcast series has an interview segment, it might be a great way to integrate that audio. However, if your live audio isn't as good or the conversation relies heavily on visuals, a podcast may not be appropriate. 6. Upload to YouTube. If you want your live video to be easily accessible to your audience for a long time, upload the video to YouTube. Similar to social networks, it allows those who have recently entered your YouTube channel to freely explore your past content. They will also be able to enjoy the feeling of supply that you only get live videos. Please note that YouTube has strict copyright rules. If your live video features music or other content that is not allowed under fair use laws, you may need to edit it in your video before uploading it. In most cases, it is best to plan what content you will reuse before starting your live video. That will give you guidance on what to cover during your lifetime to maximize the material you can use on other platforms.
